MISCELLANY.

THE FROCK COAT.—The frock, or surtout, is good! We have little or nothing to say against it: much in bined in this garment. It is warm, easy to wear, and ance; and it is becoming to man at all periods of his tunic opened in front, and made to sit tight upon the it a due degree of manly rigidity, while the inferior half partakes of the flowing folds of drapery, and gives warmth and covering down to the very linees. Of all garments that are to have any degree of freedom and looseness about them, the frock-coat is the best: it is good for a man in almost any avocation, and may be made suitable for the common business, of life as well as fer the refinements of society. But, then, it should not be worn open; it should be buttoned upon the breast. Place an officer, in his plain, closely-buttoned, undress coat, by the side of a civilian, with his loose and open frock, and the contrast is so decidedly in the favor of the former, that the point, as a matter of taste and effect, will not admit of a dispute. The one is a regular sloven compared with the other. If any thing can be said against this buttoning, it is on the score of inconvenience in civil life. Is a man at his library-table or his office-desk always to be fastened up in buckram? Where are we to stow away our watches, our knives, our toeththesese?) There is some weight in these objections; for these little articles of comfort cannot be dispensed with; and we have no better answer than to propose 113 do Fashionable Beaver small external pockets with lapels, which would not spoil the symmetry of the figure; or else, if you are 200 do do and B.
